FBAR information collection from U.S. citizens who reside outside the United States is an undue burden due to lack of communication, confusing filing requirements, and obscure definitions - even tax professionals aren't aware of the filing requirements, which puts taxpayers at risk of disproportionately high penalties.

The FBAR exists to catch overseas money laundering, but often ends up ensnaring US citizens abroad who need a basic bank account in order to receive salary, pay their bills, and live a normal life. These aren't money launderers, they're ordinary Americans such as myself who happen to live abroad. The FBAR should exclude Americans abroad to reduce the distractions so Treasury can devote its resources to real overseas money launders.

The extremely low $10,000 filing threshold has been in place since 1970. It is overdue for an update and to be — at the least — indexed to inflation. This would be $79,000 for 2024. Innocent people who go over the threshold as a one-off buying their first home or paying school tuition fees are unaware of the FBAR, don't file, then face risk of penalties. People who have heard of the FBAR are terrified of making a mistake since instructions are so confusing - even tax professionals recommend over-reporting "just in case."

This unfair treatment is a symptom of the overall problem - Americans abroad are treated as collateral damage in the war against overseas tax evasion and money laundering. The IRS recognizes Americans abroad as an underserved community. Surely that would mean that the FBAR is long overdue for review given that it is a massively complicated filing requirement that hasn't changed for over 50 years.

Instead of threatening innocent Americans abroad with life-altering penalties and burdensome filing requirements, the Department of Treasury should work with Congress to bring the US into line with the entire rest of the world in the way it taxes its expats.
