I am a professor at the Brookings Institution and a College Park Professor at the University of Maryland. I was one of the few early economists to use well-being metrics in economics, and have participated in the efforts to get well-being metrics into government statistics - in the UK, the OECD, and more, and have been pleased to see the metrics increasingly enter some of our statistical surveys. I am very positive about the HHS survey, but I do have some technical comments. Please see the attached letter below.
