After the farm bill legalized hemp, it should have immediately gone into effect that as a legal crop anyone should be permitted to grow it in their own garden (like tomato and tobacco, which can be grown freely and without fear)

Unfortunately hemp was legalized for industrial scale farming only (meaning the right to grow hemp for making paper and rope and nutritious seeds, is limited to the already wealthy. A rural individual cannot fearlessly grow their own hemp and demonstrate [on youtube, for example if one was making infotainment videos] how to diy make paper and rope. The individual right to do that is impeded by the government granting different rights to common americans. This injustice is probably an unintentional consequence of HOW [in particular the restrictions still imposed] legalization occurred. However, it is equally likely that this was intentional to benefit the land-owning wealthy, and commercial investors... Which unfortunately did nothing to protect individual rights-a higher calling for government than profit margins. And realistically such liberties would not even harm the businesses that are currently "protected")

And honestly even entheogenic growth for private consumption should be permitted and protected. The government should be uninvolved unless it is sold to another person (then regulations should be expected to go into effect to protect consumers. This is how tobacco is treated; marlboro isn't harmed by it. No one is fighting to the death over tobacco, it would be an improvement for hemp to reach such a sane freedom from stigma.)
