No issue with adjusting the process of eForm to handle the new requirements. However, the current process for approval is increasing significantly from the original target of 100 days; the ATF/FBI process for eForm approval is now averaging close to 200 days. Before implementing additional process change, the existing process needs to be PCDA to deliver/meet the existing targets and then add functionality.

I get that staffing is sparse and demand is high. But there are literally hundreds of thousands of submissions that are impacting citizens and fixing the flow/approval problems should be a priority before adding additional possible overhead. And the hard work of the legal instrument examiners IS appreciated. The overall process needs support and help, and citizens trying to do the right/legal thing shouldn't be penalized because of this.
