This whole process is ridiculous. There are 438 federal agencies. You're going to make vendors go through the same process hundreds of times. That's insane, not to mention the redundant efforts by each agency. You're making people waste tens of thousands of hours otherwise productive time to repeat a process that could be done once. If your goal is to stop the software providers from bothering to sell to the government, this policy is well on its way towards achieving that goal. This is also the type of thing that turns boring congressional oversight committee hearings into exciting ones. Go back to the drawing board and centralize this so that vendors only have to provide one attestation to one agency who can then share it with everyone.
