A few years ago, lawmakers wanted to have insight into the finances of Americans living in the United States. This was met with immediate outrage, namely from republicans. The suggestion was directly killed, yet it's okay for Americans abroad to be subjected to report such information simply because they live and work abroad? This large net to catch tax evaders has been too broadly cast. It is not fair to American citizens living abroad to be required to submit such personal information that will never be required of Americans living in the USA. This requirement most certainly needs to be reexamined.
