I find it appalling that we are willing to entertain made-up gender identities (I just saw that some identify as a season, and recently another as a stuffed animal) yet are against asking if people living in this country are citizens or not. In both cases, the answer is binary. Either you are a male (have a penis), or a female (have a vagina) are the answers for gender identity, and yes (natural born or naturalized) or no (has a visa of some sort or is here illegally) are the answers for citizenship identification.

Even more appalling is the dollars (my tax dollars) spent on performing the survey. What happens when "gender fluidity" creeps into the picture? A group of respondents claim to be "summer" one day, and "winter" the next. Are we earmarking or targeting specific programs to these genders? Does that change when the genders do? Who manages this? How will it be audited and authenticated? Against what standard, or is there none?

Last question: how do we look to the rest of the world? The answer is RIDICULOUS.
