Research has pointed out that only a marginal few percent of chronic pain patients get addicted. But the rest regains the ability to participate in society and in some cases work. Do you know why? Because living in pain is unbearable. It makes one suicidal. When that pain gets resolved, people can go back to their daily lives wherever possible.

Instead patients have become stigmatized to not receive any pain medicine at all. Even from severe surgeries! Do you know how awful it is to see someone crying for hours after hours -begging for mercy or death- because of the pain? To see the doctors refuse relief from it while it is within their power to resolve it? So instead we have people suffering instead of fixing the actual crisis. So two problems instead of one. Which means more losses economically too.
