

Author Full Name : Brie AbramReceived Date : 02/19/2025 03:55 PMComments Received :

The only reason for an ID to exist is to positively correlate the person and the document. For identification purposes, the document should describe the holder's current public appearance. My driver's license lists my current height and weight rather than my birth height and weight because my stats at birth are mostly irrelevant to identifying me now. There is no compelling reason for an identification document like a passport to make generalizations about the holder's 23rd pair of chromosomes instead of listing the gender they display now. Accurate identification should require a passport holder's listed sex to match their appearance regardless their chromosomes.