

Author Full Name : John TemplinReceived Date : 02/19/2025 08:14 PMComments Received :

Given that, biologically speaking, there are far more than two sexes, and given that one's biological sex does not always match their physical appearance, it will save a large number of taxpayer dollars if passport applications simply do not collect data on the biological sex of the individuals who are applying. Since the application already collects a host of personally specific details including Social Security numbers, name, date, and place of birth, etc., no information on sex is relevant to establishing identity.