Why should there be a rule specifically about one's "biological sex" for a passport? Intersex people and infertile people exist and are exceptions to this "male" or "female" dichotomy. Why not a rule about someone's "biological hair color"? If their hair color is listed as "blonde" but their current hair color is blue, does that application get rejected? Implementing a rule specifically regarding one's gender or sexual orientation is clearly discrimination. People have the right to update their identification, just as married women do when they take their spouse's last name.
