Requiring an applicant's "biological sex at birth" is nonsensical and reductive. Biology is not so simple as to have only "male" or "female" binaries for every single human being ever born. More to the point, how is this supposed to be enforced? If an applicant sends an application with "F" checked and their birth certificate says "F", is the application reviewer supposed to verify this is the original certificate and not an updated one? Does the applicant have to include the original even if the record was sealed? If an applicant checks "F" but their birth certificate says "M", is the entire application just thrown out? If they apply again at a later date with updated information approved by a judge, will the application still be thrown out based on the original birth certificate? Not to mention if one was born intersex and biologically doesn't fit neatly into either category. Will their reviewer make a judgement on which sex is the "correct" one and ask for more verification on that? Overall, this is a complete waste of time and resources for all involved and clearly sex discrimination.
