Denying people the right to change their sex marker on their passport will create confusion and expense for government agencies. Those agencies that have to use both state and federally issued identification (as state issued documents still allow for gender changes) will not match potentially denying US Citizens access to government services that are their right. Not allowing for changed sex markers will create dangers for American citizens traveling abroad who could face arrest or physical assault if their sex marker and bodies do not match. Removing the ability to update the sex marker on a passport is an unnecessary change that will only serve to cost the federal government and citizens more money while serving no purpose.
