According to the U.S. State Dept., the definition of a passport is a form of identification and certification of citizenship. The identification information on the card will include the holder's legal name and country of residence. This information should be enough to identify a traveler and will only cause more issues for both staff and travelers.

For example, women that appear less traditionally "feminine" may be subject to searches that will violate their privacy. Similarly, trans individuals with gender markers that do not match the letter on their passports will also be unfairly searched (and typically already are).
