I don't believe the proposed information collection (specifically, sex assigned at birth) is necessary for the proper functions of the Department. If someone has changed their gender marker, then the government should collect the most up to date and accurate information. When a person gets married and legally changes their surname, the government doesn't insist on using their "name assigned at birth" for their passport. When information such as eye color and height is collected for a driver's license, the government doesn't insist on "height assigned at birth". Relying on outdated data will only cause confusion and slow down the bureaucratic process.
