I'm writing about the fact that an applicant is required to use their biological sex. If someone appears different from their biological sex, and has been on hormones and received surgery to pass as a different gender, won't this change just confuse everyone and slow down the TSA process, which is already really slow to begin with? What is the point? This act says that it's about defending women, but I cannot see a single situation in which a person having the gender they appear to be on their passport as causing harm to women.
