The executive order that requires the sex at birth to be included on a passport should NOT be followed through. This information isn't useful for identification purposes at border crossings, as it only provides the information of what someone's genitalia looks like at the time of birth. The government requiring this information is not only non-useful, but an invasion of privacy. In addition, intersex people exist and cannot be categorized by simply being "male" or "female".

It would make more sense to remove the sex option altogether, as including this (and especially including "sex at birth") would cause confusion when being checked at border crossings if someone doesn't fit into the stereotypical appearance of their sex at birth. As an identifying document, things such as a picture, hair color, eye color, etc. are much more useful to check if someone is who they say they are.
