Requiring a government document to reflect medical history that is no longer relevant could cause considerable confusion during the travel process. Travel documents need to reflect the person that is traveling with the most current information and identification. Not only would this require more education for the TSA, it would also impose the burden of additional time spent at security on to other travelers. Overall, allowing citizens to update their travel documents to reflect them in the best possible way will save time and money. This is not a threat to national security and addition funds should not be allocated to create confusion and threaten individuals travel process and ability.
