This change, while it may comply with an E.O., does not reflect biology and may end up contradicting state or other forms of identification, leading to confusion and inability to travel. Sex assigned at birth is a flimsy form of identification that does not help with identification of travelers as adults, and is an outdated field made further outdated with the modification of "gender" back to "sex". Use of sex assigned at birth also invalidates the existence of individuals with intersex characteristics, a 16% part of the population whose assigned sex at birth often does not align with their gender expression or even developed biological characteristics and again is not a useful tool for identification. The field should reflect the presentation the traveler is most likely to respond to, if the field is required at all.
