Allowing individuals to have a sex/gender marker on their passport that differs from their birth certificate is important because it ensures that official documents reflect who they are in daily life. Many people's appearance, social recognition, and lived experience do not align with what was recorded at birth, and requiring a fixed designation can create unnecessary barriers, cause confusion, and treats many people without the dignity they deserve.

Having a passport that accurately represents how a person is perceived reduces the risk of harassment, confusion, or even denial of entry when traveling. It also protects privacy by preventing forced disclosure of personal history and private information that may not be relevant in most situations. Ultimately, this flexibility promotes safety, dignity, and equal treatment in both legal and practical contexts.
