Transgender US citizens should be no less eligible for a valid passport than any other citizen. To do otherwise would be to set up a lower class citizenship status, a form of discrimination that cannot and should not stand. I have often heard the administration and their supporters within and without the government argue that the Constitution is the most sacred part of our American heritage, and that it must not be violated under any circumstance.

However, I do not see the current administration respecting this most sacred order, but in fact flagrantly infringing on it in some of the most illegal ways. While these are being challenged in the courts, I believe the administration itself should step up to maintain the constitution on their own. To do otherwise is to offend the nation they claim to defend.
