Restricting name change and data correction seems really inefficient and not super in-line with the realities of how a lot of people navigate their day-to-days. It's really easy to pretend that people outside the gender binary don't exist in day-to-day, but I think logistically trying to boil down the massive amount of variance in chromosomes, or in androgen sensitivity, or in discrepancy between perceived gender and actual gender, to only two genders seems really moronic and like it's asking for a lot of complication for something that's not broken and doesn't need fixing.
