It is great to see sanity returning to the federal government. Passports are the ultimate form of identification in any country; their primary purpose is to allow government officials—both domestically and abroad—to accurately verify a person's identity by listing essential biographic information: name, age, height, and, yes, sex. These are objective characteristics that cannot simply be "self-identified" away, as that would undermine the very purpose of an identification document. People are free to dress however they choose and may even legally change their name; however, sex is immutable and binary.
