The purpose of a gender marker on a passport is to make the individual more identifiable. Changing this to "biological sex at birth" but only allowing the indicators to be "M" or "F" leaves no option for intersex individuals, whose chromosomes often do not match their outward appearance in the simplistic expectation of conformation to "male" or "female" this EO attempts to create.

You can attempt to force confirmation to a sexual binary as hard as you would like, but none of that will change scientific fact. On top of all that, it also blatantly ignores that the "biological sex at birth" of an individual has zero correlation to how they aesthetically present themselves in society, and this change will not aid in making them more identifiable at all. It will cause undue cost on the department and present zero benefit but heaps of confusion.
