There is no point to having a gender/assigned sex at conception (or birth) marker on a passport. It was only added in the 1970's.

This isn't about identification - this is about creating an "other" to rail against.

The EO that declares that there are "only male/female" is scientifically inaccurate and an embarrassment. At conception, all gametes are female. At birth, there are a wide range of biological possibilities.

(Why was the application form reverted, without notice, to a previous, outdated version? That was an illegal move.)
