A person's genital configuration at birth has little to do with their legal identity. The important things are name, social security number, and address. I find the requirements set out in the executive order for gender to be asinine and confusing. If someone were infertile from birth, what would their legal gender be? Additionally, the president does not have the medical qualifications or authority to decide what gender and sex are, that is left to our nation's hardworking doctors and professionals. This executive order will also cost a lot of money to enact, as each US citizen would need medical examinations to see what gametes they produce. Not to mention the danger this poses in the case of a predatory examiner. This money could be better spent in eradicating homelessness or reforming the public school system, something that affects Americans on a much larger scale. It would be easier and better for everyone to remove the gender marker, rather than step on the toes of professionals and attempt to legislate things that the president has no knowledge in. Overall I find this executive order a waste of time and highly intrusive.
