Folks should be able to apply for a passport under the gender they are currently living as, regardless of the gender assigned to them at birth.

They are living as their current gender & have legal documents as their current gender. What sense does it make to have a passport contradicting that? How will that help government travel officials do their job of verifying identification to individuals and screening out truly dangerous people and situations?

I don't think it will. It's a waste of time money and resources.
