Hello, I would like to express my deep disappointment at the attempts enshrined in the changes to this policy that seek to exclude and undermine the validity of transgender and nonbinary Americans. There is no part of a transgender American holding a passport with a marker that correctly defines their gender that negatively affects the public. If anything, it will now be more difficult for such individuals to travel freely on account of them not "looking" like the gender they were assigned at birth. This has little to do with "biological reality", as the current administration seems to be so keen on throwing that phrase around every chance they get. Intersex people, for instance, will be forced to comply with a gender (or as you now call it, sex) that does not actually match their genital traits. If the president and his administration are so interested in helping the American people, he may want to start by addressing the inflation currently experienced by the majority of citizens, or putting attention towards the bird flu epidemic. I would look forward to hearing about lower prices for eggs instead of the new laws levied against an American minority.
