In most US states, to change one's passport for updated name or gender marker requires a court hearing, or in some cases many court hearings. To work within the legal system to receive these changes, for what is sometimes years, only to have said changes stripped away by overreaching and unconstitutional restrictions on American identity, weakens both public faith, and practical power, of the court system as a bastion of US law and liberty to live freely.

These restrictions will lead to weakened public faith in their representatives, but also likely prove to many effected citizens that working within the law is a waste of time. Both to maintain the strength and symbolism of US courts, and to preserve the liberties of American citizens, transgender or otherwise, these changes cannot go forward.
