I am very concerned about new regulations for passport renewal in that so many people go through changes in their marital status or that their gender was misrepresented at some point in their life. As someone who has been married and divorced twice I realized that, as a woman, I had to submit a legal document to a court to get my birth name returned to me but I don't remember doing that separate step for my second marriage. Does this mean that despite having half dozen passports, the next time I renew my passport I will have to provide additional legal documents for who I am? Let's be sensible! Whatever is on my birth certificate may not be how I am known in the world today.
