This form should allow for easier changes for gender markers and gender identity to better reflect the lived experience of the citizen who carries that passport.

Any gender marker requirements for passports needs to take into account people like me, who are nonbinary and assume that when you use "she/her" or "he/him" that you are talking about someone else and not me. People like me make up at least 5% of the US population, or up to 15 million people - more if you include intersex people, who are born with chromosomal combinations outside of "xx" and "xy." Intersex people also deserve to have their lived experience respected in official documents.
