Passport applications must allow gender markers and gender identity outside of the "male/female" binary.

Gender marker requirements for passports needs to take into account nonbinary people like me, who assume that when you use "she/her" or "he/him" that you are talking about someone else, not me.

Nonbinary people make up at least 15 million people in the US population. This includes intersex people, who are born with chromosomal combinations outside of "xx" and "xy" and could not be "male" or "female." Intersex and nonbinary folks deserve to have their lived experience respected in passports, and should be included in the passport application process.
