I am writing to express my strong opposition to the recent policy change prohibiting transgender individuals from obtaining passports that accurately reflect their gender identity. This decision is not only discriminatory but also a direct attack on the fundamental rights and dignity of transgender people.

Legal recognition of gender identity is critical for personal safety, travel, and participation in society. By restricting access to accurate identification, this policy places transgender people at increased risk of harassment, discrimination, and even violence—both domestically and internationally. It also creates unnecessary barriers to employment, healthcare, and civic engagement, as passports serve as primary identification for many essential services.

Furthermore, this policy contradicts established medical and legal consensus. Major organizations, including the American Medical Association and the American Psychological Association, recognize gender transition as a legitimate and necessary aspect of healthcare. Many countries and states already allow for self-identification on government-issued documents, aligning with human rights standards and reducing administrative burdens.

The ability to obtain accurate identification is not a privilege—it is a fundamental right. Rolling back these protections is an egregious step backward in the fight for equality, and I urge the administration to immediately reverse this harmful policy. Transgender Americans deserve the same rights, dignity, and access to essential services as any other citizen.
