As far as I am aware, when a trans person wishes to have their gender marker officially changed on State issued identification (such as a drivers license), they must appear in court to make that change. If a State court has already recognized such a change, one would think that it be best that passports match these State officiated alterations, as passports are used as both identification and verification of citizenship. To override this procedure is to override State decision, and to put taxpayer money to waste in implementing these changes. Therefore, it would be best to allow for name changes and other data correction that accurately reflects the individual and their court-recognized identity.
