Recognizing gender identity on passports is not a privilege—it's a basic human right. When a transgender, nonbinary, intersex, or gender-nonconforming person requests to update their name or gender marker, it is not a matter of preference but an essential step in affirming their identity and ensuring their safety. The government's role should be to respect and acknowledge its citizens, not impose outdated classifications that create barriers to travel, employment, and daily life. Everyone deserves identification that accurately represents who they are. Denying this right is not just an inconvenience—it is an act of disregard for a person's dignity and humanity.
