Forcing outdated or incorrect gender markers on passports creates unnecessary burdens for transgender, nonbinary, intersex, and gender-nonconforming individuals. A passport should be a simple, accurate reflection of a person's identity—not a tool for the government to dictate sex or gender. When someone renews their passport, they should have the right to update their information so it aligns with who they are. Denying this not only disrespects their identity but also puts them at risk for discrimination, travel difficulties, and even personal safety concerns. The role of government should be to serve and protect its citizens, not impose rigid definitions of gender that make life harder for those who don't fit outdated norms. Recognizing and respecting a person's identity on official documents is a basic step toward ensuring equal rights and dignity for all.
