The Executive Branch cannot dictate individual people's gender. If a person lives in the social role of man, woman, or other, that information is much more relevant to their identification than the guess a doctor made in sexing them at their birth. Allowing for self-identification of this category of demographic (including recognizing when people do not adhere to a binary gender) is a much more accurate way to allow US citizens to interact with US customs than forcing them to have an inaccurate gender marker in their identity documents. This change makes life worse for our fellow citizens, and makes the job of authorities harder in keeping us safe. The forms should remain the way they are currently written.
