

Author Full Name : Madison CarrollReceived Date : 03/02/2025 01:48 PMComments Received :

I strongly disagree with narrowing the definition of "sex" to be based on the biological production of reproductive cells as it relates to an identification document such as a passport. This fails to consider the very real existence of millions of intersex people, never mind transgender people. If the supporting documents submitted by an applicant support the requested change in sex, the passport should reflect those documents. Issuing a passport with any mismatched information when compared to other identifying documents will cause confusion and inefficiency across many government departments. IE An individual's appearance and supplemental documents do not match their sex marker, they may be flagged and refused entry (or re-entry) to certain countries and refused services provided by the government, including the ability to obtain other identifying documents.