This is a terrible idea as it is targeting trans people for existing and seeing the US government used to further discrimination makes me so deeply ashamed. It's irrelevant. It doesn't matter. You're going to have two main impacts from this. First, you're going to make trans people suffer, which I assume is why you're doing this. (You should be ashamed of that, by the way.) Second, it's going to make air travel worse. WORSE. Do you understand how miserable an experience air travel is, and now I have to wait because some man who is masculine-presenting and very obviously a man, beard and everything, has to explain that he's a man even though his passport says F because he was assigned female at birth? It's going to cause confusion and delays. This won't protect anyone.

Frankly, why do you even care how someone's genitals looked when they came screaming and bloody out of their mama? Why is that important? It isn't. This is a weird and pointless addition.

Also, I suggest you learn more about intersex people, because not everyone is explicitly male or female. This is science. This is literal science. There are dozens of chromosomal variations and genital presentations capable within humanity. Yes, really. Even if you hate trans people because you believe (wrongly) that they "chose this", what is the source of your hatred for intersex people? They have a genetic variance and may have been born with atypical genitalia. Requiring people to identify that their assigned gender at birth was "male" or "female" completely excludes people who were born outside that binary.

Requiring sex at birth info is discrimination. It's also pointless. Further it is scientifically inaccurate as intersex folks either may not present as clearly one sex or another (since there are more than two sexes), or may present with genitalia that does not actually match the biological sex with which they are most aligned.

This is a bad idea and won't do anything good for anyone.
