I urge you to reject this policy change. As a cisgender person, I may never fully understand the challenges transgender and intersex individuals face, but I do know that every person deserves to live with dignity, safety, and equal rights under the law. The federal government should not be in the business of forcing people to disclose deeply personal information about their gender assigned at birth—especially when doing so can put their safety at risk.

All of us rely on accurate and consistent identification documents to travel, start new jobs, open bank accounts, and enroll in school. For transgender people, having an ID that aligns with their identity is not just about convenience—it is about survival. Being forced to present identification that does not reflect who they are can lead to discrimination, harassment, and even violence.

Requiring transgender individuals to provide proof of their gender assigned at birth is not just invasive—it is dangerous. It forces them to reveal personal details that can expose them to mistreatment in everyday situations, whether at an airport, in a job interview, or during a routine interaction with law enforcement. No one should have to live in fear that their official documents could be used to deny them dignity and respect.

It is also a waste of government resources to investigate and verify information that serves no real purpose beyond making life harder for transgender and intersex individuals. The federal government should be working to protect all citizens, not imposing unnecessary burdens that make it harder for people to access essential identification.

As a cisgender person, I recognize that my ability to move through life without worrying about my identity documents is a privilege—one that should not be denied to others simply because they are transgender or intersex. This policy change is not about security or fairness; it is about discrimination.

I urge the Department of State to reject this harmful and unnecessary policy. Transgender and intersex people deserve the same rights and protections that every American enjoys, including the ability to obtain accurate identification without fear of being outed, harassed, or denied basic dignity.
