I can't see any advantage of bloating the already slow and complex passport acquisition, renewal and verification process with arbitrary enforcement around the complex nature of gender into what ultimately will boil down to just how the people assigning it feel at the time.

Trans, Intersex people and their families in particular may not even have a clear answer to this arbitrary distinction, regardless of what certain federal mandates have decided to invent. and wasting the already strained resources of the federal workforce trying to case by case mediate any ambiguities strikes me as a huge financial and time burden.

The only possible use I can see for doing this, is to more effectively profile anyone that doesn't fit neatly into this arbitrary binary to more effectively persecute them. And if that is the true intent here, I consider that to be a gross disregard of human rights, as well as what I still idealistically hope are tenants of freedom and acceptance within this nation.
