The proposed changes to the passport gender markers are impractical and expensive. The manpower required to verify someone's gender would be extensive, thereby going on the taxpayers' dime. To find the applicants original gender extensive research would have to be done into the applicant's birth records, encroaching on state jurisdiction and violating the state's rights in regards to issuing birth certificates.

All this would cost unnecessary time and money from an already tightened budget.

An attempt to impose birth-assigned gender classifications violates the American Individual's personal freedom. In many cases the new gender marker has been passed and approved on a State level; Tracking this change, when it had already been approved lawfully, and reversing the action is a waste of government funds, time and manpower. It is also an appalling overreach of a government that claims to respect the American citizen's freedom and individuality.

This is a dangerous indicator for what is to come if this change is brought about.
