As a practicing Christian, I am strongly morally opposed to an officially bigoted position on Trans people. A working definition of bigotry is the practice of ignoring people who actually exist, even though you wished they didn't. Then, when they have the temerity to come into your your view anyway, to despise and/or oppress them

Second, Trans people exist whether one likes it or not - regardless of one possible interpretation of Scripture. Imposing that one possible interpretation of Scripture as government policy also violates the separation of Church and State. It imposes aspects of a state religion on those who don't believe it.

Finally, one function of passports is to identify people. Making it impossible to do that for trans people fails that purpose, and makes life a lot harder for trans people.
