Practical utility - Records disposition schedule:

The keyword "contract finance" was not found in the "U.S. Government financial report" (reference 1 (attachment 4)) table of contents. Also, keywords for the offices in the notice were not found - "defense", "general services", and "national aeronautics". Finding these keywords is one way to show records management processes disposition the collected contract finance data into a final report, one type of practical utility.

Practical utility - difference between finance and books:

Risk of different schedules for finance and documentation was observed. In addition to unavailable keywords in the previous paragraph, half of the federal supply classes (FSCs) were found not to have a property management specification, and the average age of these specifications was about 17 years. Specification processes were an option to help contracting process modularize the finances. Specifications were briefly mentioned in the FASA of 1994, and supported by reference 2. Attachment 1a provides more detailed comments regarding the status and practical utility of this approach.

3. Practical utility - Employment processes:

A contracts job category at the employment development office (reference 3) is practical for personnel awareness of contracting goals and preparation to place actual positions if necessary. Although excellent employment offices existed, a contract job category was not found in the one-stop job database. Actual fielded job categories had a copyright, so were not copied as an attachment, but the keyword "contract" was not found in the set. Similarly, a contracts job category was not found in some of the paper occupational guides, such as reference 4a/b, a parallel method to the one-stop for increasing awareness of contract objectives.

4. Public burden - Legal codes:

Perception (incorrect or correct) of differences between code volumes or between codes and actual processes reduces their reading and use. Attachment 2a provides comments regarding optimizing the use of legal books. Easier use translates into reduced burdens.

5. Practical utility - Depository library:

The depository library had a list of classes (reference 5) capable of configuring a sub-class for contract finance procedures and product descriptions. No subclasses were found for NASA. This indicated the depository library resource was under-utilized for NASA, not just for contract finance, but overall for all sub-categories. All the classes were good, but the library separated offices instead of combining like the current federal register notice - DoD, GSA, & NASA. This indicated the effort to have a merged contract finance process was limited to some extent by other resources not having the same information structure. Selected materials from the library used to derive these conclusions were put in attachment 3.

Attachment 1 - Specification comments

Specifications and specification classes offer practical utility to facilitate modularized contract finances. Modularized finance then facilitates risk reduction, performance metrics, and accounting structures.

1.

Contract searching:

Search fields to divide contracts by specifications, classes, or groups were not found on the web page that published contracts (reference 6a). Several product classification methods had integrated into the legal codes to include Federal Supply classifications (FSC) system and North American Industrial Classification Code System (NAICS) as listed in reference 7a/b. Corresponding search parameters were not found in the contracting page however. Also, a separate GSA Subcontracting Directory was found as listed in reference 6b. It derived from the depository library instead of CFR. It looked like a good directory, but separated from reference 6a, and with objectives other than searching on specifications and classifications.

2a.

Completeness:

As shown in attachment 1b, approximately 47% of the pre-defined Federal Supply Classes (FSC) had a specification from the index of federal specifications (reference 8). In other words, approximately 53% of the FSCs did not have an associated property management specification. 53% was large enough to cause whole empty Federal Supply Group (FSG), as listed in the table below.

Table X - FSG found empty in attachment 1b.

FSG, Title

11, Nuclear ordnance

12, Fire Control Equipment

14, Guided Missiles

18, Space Vehicles

33, Historical FSG

77, Musical Instruments, Phonographs, and Home-Type Radios

78, Recreational and Athletic Equipment

87, Agricultural Supplies

88, Live Animals

2b.

Completeness - filling in blanks:

Unlike the contract web site which did not search on supply class and specifications, the ASSIST database (reference 9) allowed these searches. Based on spot checks, the ASSIST database was estimated to have more public release specifications than were in the index of federal specifications. Therefore, there were multiple lists of public specifications. Presenting a single list to the public reduced risk of uncertainty prioritizing between the different lists. The extra specifications in the ASSIST database offered potential to fill in the empty FSCs discussed in the previous paragraph.

3a Currency:

The average property management specifications was 17 years old, as calculated in attachment 1c, and summarized in the table below. 17 years old was at risk of not being current with the 16 year old Federal Acquisition Streamlining Act (FASA) of 1994. Also, reference 10 encouraged 5 year reviews for specifications. The 5 year reviews were assumed to occur, but the status was not always seen in the ASSIST database. Currency labels may help any contract officers interested in reviewing the materials to assess suitability faster. Currency also supports other financial efforts that might have interest to use the materials. Although the current contract finance effort was not found in the financial report (reference 1), other programs had been listed like the recovery and re-investment act, and might be able to apply some of these books.

Table - average age and percentile ages for property management specifications

3b. Consequences of expiration:

It is obvious that specifications contain descriptions of products. However, it is not as obvious that if the specification books start to expire, product specifications may appear in other book volumes which had been intended for other purposes like procedures. Therefore, currency of the specifications reduces risk of specifications spreading to other book volumes. Once content has spread to other books, it is very difficult to know how to search, because of uncertainty in which book volume to start, and if more than one book volume has to be searched.

4. Consistency of specification databases:

Most of the time FSGs and FSCs were the same between internet databases, but not always. Different status was sometimes encountered between the defense logistics agency (DLA) page, the ASSIST database, and index of federal specifications. For example, two historical FSGs (21 & 33) found in the DLA cataloging web site were not found in the ASSIST database. Also, additional FSCs at the end of the ASSIST index were not found on the DLA catalog. The five oldest specifications in the index of specifications (1932-1950) had a different status in the ASSIST database. Some were not found, others were cancelled instead of active, and one had a different FSC. FSC 8565 was found in the index of specifications, but not recognized in the predefined FSCs on the DLA site.

Points of contact - specifications:

Points of contact by class, group, or equivalent may reduce paperwork compared to points of contact by specification. There were numerically fewer FSGs and FSC than specification - 80 FSGs, 667 FSCs, and 5718 records in the index of specifications. The ASSIST database currently filed points of contact by specification, therefore it was estimated to contain approximately 5718 points of contact, instead of 80 or 667 for the FSG/FSC approach.

6. Index of federal specifications and standards:

The electronic index of specifications was good on the internet, but the electronic format was not reflected in the depository library list of classes. The list of classes differentiated formats between paper (P) and electronic (EL). the currently list only identified paper format (Apr 2010 list]. Coordinating with the depository library publishers was one way for the internet content to optimally match to the list published by the depository library.
