

The NACARA Act and the Application for Suspension of Deportation or Special Rule Cancellation of Removal need to be revamped. More research on the countries that are included in the NACARA Act need to be conducted. The requirements to become qualified for the NACARA Act should be stricter. Any one person can claim their home country doesn't help them so they can remain in the United States. Guatemala, for example, has programs and organizations such as Weaving Hope Ministry to help their people. The United States needs to do more research on what those countries have to offer their people. The United States should deport those people whose countries can help them, but also make sure the individuals are educated on their options of help in their home country.
